I'm happy to meet as soon as possible, as I wrote yesterday. The sooner the better. I really want and need to finish our work on the manuscript.

This said (which I'm sure is no surprise,) would it be faster and simpler for you to send me the manuscript, so that I can start incorporating the changes/redactions you have collectively come up with? You'll recall that I accepted the overwhelming majority of your proposed changes in our previous iterations. Or, will it be more efficient for us to sit down face to face directly, and then have me make necessary changes afterwards? Whichever approach will be simpler, and therefore faster, is better. I do very much want to avoid yet another round.

I'm not pushing either way. I just want to do whatever will be most efficient and fastest. My firm intention, either way, is to be constructive and to work out mutually acceptable solutions to any outstanding points—I'm determined for us to find solutions—and to do so now.

Yours,

Glenn
